P R E F A C E.

NO man appears as a candidate for publick favour, without some degree of anxiety; and, humble as the task may be which has been performed by the Compiler of the following sheets, he is unwilling to intrude himself abruptly upon the world, and therefore begs leave to introduce his work with a few conciliating observations.

It is not his intention, in this prefatory address, to say any thing upon the question concerning the advantage and disadvantage of Entails. Upon that question, very different opinions have been maintained by able writers,—some extolling them, as the only means of preserving ancient families, the pillars of civil society,—and others decrying them, as inconsistent with commercial prosperity. Perhaps, a middle opinion may be formed, by which the propriety of Entails may be justified, if only a certain proportion of the lands of any country shall be permitted to have the privilege of being secured against alienation, while enough is left free to excite industrious ambition, which will be strengthened by the hope, that what it shall acquire may be rendered permanent.

BUT whatever may be the wisdom or policy of Entails, there is no doubt that they at present form an important part of the Constitution of Scotland; and, therefore, it is at least a matter of very general and interesting curiosity, to know, who are the persons, and what are the lands to whom perpetuity is annexed, as far as is possible, in the uncertain and transitory state of human affairs.--- Uncertain and transitory indeed they are,—of which the Register of Entails itself affords striking proofs; for we there find, that many families, which, when the entails were made, flourished in the highest eminence, and spread their numerous branches around, have, in the course of a few generations, decayed and become utterly extinct.

It is not, however, as an object of curiosity only, that this INDEX of ENTAILS is offered to the Publick. The Compiler means that it should also be of considerable utility, both to proprietors of entailed estates, and to people in general who may have occasion to deal with them.——To a man whose intentions are prudent and honest, it is no advantage to have a more extensive credit than belongs to his share of property; and the consciousness that the world is acquainted with his situation, is an additional motive to moderation and œconomy. To the infinite number of men in all departments, who may be deceived by those who have the appearance of large estates, it is surely a most important caution, to be informed, that those estates are held by a tenure, the influence of which ceases with the life of the possessor. What is now mentioned, is sufficiently plain, and will not be relished the worse that it is delicately expressed.

SUCH being the purposes which this compilation may serve, reasonable hopes may be entertained, that it will meet with an indulgent reception.——The Compiler offers an acknowledgment of sincere gratitude titude to Mr. Campbell, the keeper of the Record of Entails, for the very obliging and liberal manner, in which that Gentleman has been pleased to treat him.

THE Compiler cannot flatter his vanity with expectations of the praise due to genius or abilities, from a performance which admits of neither. But it is a satisfaction to think, that while those who aspire to such praise are often deceived,—he, whose sole merit consists in attention, labour, and accuracy, may be more certain that he has done well what he purposed to do. The Compiler therefore trusts, that, as his claim is not extensive, he will not be disappointed in obtaining his reward.
